

All my love

I'd let your love tear me apart,
For it's already ripped through my soul like a storm's art.
Though I stumble and fail,
I'm shredded by every mistake, like paper caught in a gale.
I wonder if it will ever be enough,
When you've given more than I could ever match.

I wonder if we'll ever meet in the same storm's eye,
Since you've sacrificed more than I can repay.
But I'd endure your curses, bear every weight of sin,
Face every burning wound and let the pain begin.
I'd confront each harsh word like shards of glass,
Taking the blows as the moments pass.

I'd face your seven deaths in seven relentless waves,
Swallow every ounce of anguish that your heart craves.
And if that's still not enough,
I'd absorb every splinter of your suffering, rough.
For your torment and despair, I'd embrace it all,
Each fragment of your worries, I'd take the fall.